Excerpt: . the air was filled with the not disagreeable odor of burning stalks. From across the fields the farmer s merry whistle, mingling with the voices of meadow Ilarks, reached our ears. Everything was suggestive of new life, these busy and happy hours of spring. Crossing at hrier field, which proved unprofitable collecting ground, we entered a net wood, a favorite nesting place of the cardinals. Aweek previous several nests had been located. To our surprise out of seven nests examined-four were found to be deserted. We were not long remaining in ignorance of the cause, and at one nest discovered the rascally blue jays at work. They were quite noisy and as they made no move to leave the vicinity, we hustled them off with clubs, and they disappeared in the forest uttering loud cries. In one nest an empty shell had been left, with a large hole in the side. The Cardinal (Car dz 1z.z/is Cardinalis) is an early breeder and it is the writer s experience, to find in this locality that a majority of the early nests are placed in Cedar bushes. As an exception one nest was found in the crotch of a naked C and somewhat isolated sapling. We are led to believe that the nests are placed in the thick cedar, not because the birds like it better than other growth, but for protection and to elude observation, for later when trees are in full foliage, other...
