Excerpt: . . . she worked a great deal, but that all the other little girls were crazy to have flower-beds And when some of the children began to be interested in the specimens their sisters brought home, and wanted to go on the rambles and searches, young Grandmother Bradlee said, Lets form them into a club by themselves, and have them grow up interested in plants and outdoor life. So a club of five was started. The youngest member was a week over four years old, and the oldest--Miss Patty, the ministers daughter--was a month over six years old. She was made the president of the baby club. . Miss Patty was always called Miss Patty. She was really quite dignified and sensible. She and her papa lived alone in the parsonage. Of course there were servants; but it was Miss Patty who presided at table, even when there was a guest. She could pour tea very well, and knew how flowers ought to be arranged in a vase, and had learned to cut the jonquils and roses and carnations in the old garden with very good taste as to numbers and foliage and length of stem. Any little girl as old as Miss Patty ought to be able to perform these pretty womanly duties. Every one thought Miss Patty was the right one to act as president when the baby club was formed. The mammas of the children said they should feel safe about the rambles...
