It is important people with autism use social thinking skills to understand social concepts of what people are saying. An example is if someone says it is raining cats and dogs outside. People with autism need the social thinking skills to be able to understand that it is not raining cats and dogs out. Context Is King is a quote by one of Tom s favorite Autism professionals in the world, Dr. Peter Gerhardt. It is so true because we live in a world that communicates 93 of the time non-verbally and only 7 percent verbally. People often do not say exactly what they mean and this can be confusing for people with autism. We must understand social thinking so that we can use social thinking skills to be able to read and understand the social context of what other people are trying to communicate. An example of this is approaching a group of people. We must use social thinking skills to try and decide if the group is a high energy group or a low energy group. Why do we need to know this? Because we must anticipate the energy level and match the entire group s level of energy. Tom knows of a woman who got pregnant because she did not understand the social context of what her mother was telling her. Her mother said that she could not get pregnant until she got married. The girl took her literally and did not think it was physically possible for her to get pregnant until she got married. This is one example...
