It is to be understood, however, that many of the views expressed concerning questions in the sciences may, from time to time, be modified by new developments. In every instance, the opinions given are based upon the known sciences as manifested through the medium of the arts, and more particularly the electric telegraph. I have reviewed the early semaphore telegraphs, and explained their respective modes of operation. These visual systems have, however, ceased to be employed by civilized nations, except for the marine service. As preliminary to the consideration of the electric telegraph, I have introduced a few chapters explanatory of the sciences immediately blended in that art; such, for example, as static and voltaic electricities, magnetism, and electro-magnetism. These questions of philosophy the telegrapher should most carefully study. The data given are from the most reliable authorities.
