Not illustrated. 1869 Excerpt: . mind me, Margaret, I shall do very well, said Mrs. Fisher; and taking the two baskets, she left the children under Margaret s care. Mrs. Fisher found Mrs. Pringle more seriously ill than she had expected; she had in the night become suddenly worse, and now she could move neither hand nor foot; even the weight of the bed-clothes seemed too much for her, and the least movement of them caused her to cry out with pain. Betty tried her utmost to help her mother, but to nurse such an invalid was more than the poor child could do. Mrs. Fisher saw this, and promised she would send some one to look after her. She then emptied the baskets of their contents, which might tend to the comfort of the poor invalid. God bless you for your goodness, ma am, Mrs. Pringle faintly said, as...
