MUSIC DURING THE MIDDLE AGES--CONTINUED. Having now brought down our inquiries to what in the European annals are termed the middle ages, we find that the people of Ireland were far from enjoying the sweets of peace, the nurse of science, as the sword of the stranger was seldom permitted to rest in the scabbard; and as the Irish chieftains had to defend their lands from the inroads of those Anglo-Norman invaders who sought to extend their possession of the fair valleys of Erin. Yet under these very uncongenial circumstances, our music and poetry still flourished. We find that although deprived of considerable portions of their lands, harassed by continual warfare, and subdued in spirit, the undying spirit of music still reigned in the bosoms of the people, by whom it was cherished; and so firmly was it implanted in their nature that even the rude hand of strife could not eradicate it, although it might, from their desponding condition, have damped, to some extent, their more fervid aspirations to the tuneful muse. Mr. Walker says, that on the revival of literature in the eleventh century, after the conversion of our Norman enemies, the Irish attempted, ineffectually, to restore things to their former state. The Filean Colleges were re-established, but with less liberal endowments, and with less strict discipline; however, they continued to be supported until the reign of Charles the Second. The bardic order was now (eleventh century) divided into...
