Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from The Liberty Bell: From Independence Hall, Philadelphia to Atlanta Independence Hall, Philadelphia, comprises three main buildings. A central structure - the State House with offices adjoining - and two separate buildings, one erected for the city and the other for the county of Philadelphia. The central building was designed and built by Andrew Hamilton, a Barrister of Philadelphia. The two others, the lots for which he procured, and for the erection of which he created a trust, were not built until after the close of the Revolution. The whole together has a frontage on Chestnut street of 396 feet, and was at the time of its completion the largest building for State and municipal purposes in the country. The story of its construction is as follows: On the first of the third month 1729 the representatives, as they styled themselves, of the free men of Pennsylvania, in General Assembly met, determined to build a house for themselves, having been up to that time obliged to hire private houses for their sittings. The Act in manuscript still exists and is in the handwriting of Andrew Hamilton. On the 11th of August, 1732, Mr. Hamilton exhibited a plan and elevation of the house or building, - the central building as it now stands, and the same being compared with several other plans and elevations, was approved, and the House, after consideration, resolved, that Mr. Hamilton be the person to superintend and govern the building, and that the House for his trouble would make him compensation. Mr. Hamilton, to meet the requirements for the better preservation of the public papers of the Province, produced in 1732, on the...
