Only a part of it is yet cleared, being in many places covered with its original woods; a circumstance to the benefit of the present planters in many respects. The face of the country in one respect is very singular; there is neither a brook, rivulet, or spring in the whole island, which obliges the inhabitants to depend on artificial ponds, cisterns, and reservoirs of water for all their uses. Threatening as this was originally, experience has removed the difficulties which flowed from it, and they have been able to supply themselves very regularly with this necessary of life. The soil of the island is generally sandy, but not therefore infertile; on the contrary, there are nowhere more flourishing sugar plantations to be met with than in this island; for there is a loamy...
