Paperback. Condition: New. 62 pages. Cybernetics is a human phenomenon! It is about the unique ability of human beings to observe, conceptualise and/or simulate self-regulatory systems. This is a theoretical framework exploring the Cybernetics of education in an evolutionary perspective with links to current global sustainability issues; that is an examination of education as a closed system in relation to Cornings Holistic Darwinism and the call for synergism, in addition to a recent scientific finding related to the structure of the human brain. The paper goes briefly through the theories and principles dominant in the field of education and their praxis, in a cybernetic perspective, correspondent to the cyclic nature of life equilibrium on earth to show how education has shaped our human identity. The book provides evidence that the human needs go in a cycle rather than the traditional hierarchy, and proposes a solution for the identity crisis in the third order cybernetics, in addition to drafting some Cybernetic sketches of information issues that might be of a significant impact on the viability of our life system(s). The Conservation of Homo sapiens is a call for self-awareness and the communication of a duality of values underlying the Kin discrimination and influencing the inclusive fitness of our species. It is on the survival of our species by means of Cybernetic selection. This perspective visits three domains of knowledge: Education, behavioural biology and Cybernetics - although Cybernetics is not exactly an academia aiming at facilitating reconciliation over the human identity torn between biological and social sciences. In this book, I take my position from the Natural Selection paradigm with a focus on information and communication. The book includes an appeal to the IUCN conservation specialists to either set Homo sapiens on the top of their list of endangered species as a...
