WITH sensations very different from those with which she quitted Oatham, she returned to it, and now all her and her friends endeavours were directed to remove the consequences of her afflictions: this was facilitated by the prospect before her, which presenting to her view all she could rationally wish in the world, filled her mind with ineffable joy and gratitude, and a few days exhibited her character in a light which, since her first leaving Marstonbury, it had rarely been seen in. One week of expectation was elapsed, when Lord Farnford wrote to Mr. Gaynham, requesting to see him at Mount Felix on the day next but one following, when he intended in the space of the world to marry Miss Lyscot: he hinted a wish that he might afterwards be permitted to visit Constance; but she, sorry to find him so inclined to start trait aside from his intended course, shook her head, at hearings, and said it must not be. On the day named, Mr. Gaynham went to Mount Felix, and returning in the evening, gave Lady Harriet and Constance such an account of Lord Farnford's conversation, of his behaviour to Charlotte, who was brought from her sathers in the morning, and of his expressions of sorrow for his conduct to Miss Fitzarthur, as removed the very defensible hatred of her, who, for her brothers sake, abhorred him, and drew the sincerest pity, forgiveness, and even esteem,...
