Pursuant to a congressional request and a legislative requirement, GAO reviewed how various North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) countries were implementing their reciprocal defense procurement memoranda of understanding (MOU) with the United States, focusing on: (1) how the United States and its allies viewed and implemented MOU; (2) whether MOU provide opportunities for U. S. firms to freely and fairly compete in allied defense markets; (3) the extent to which allied governments tariff practices affected contract selections; (4) allied contract award grievance procedures; and (5) the Department of Defenses (DOD) efforts to monitor MOU. GAO found that: (1) MOU obligate signatories to evaluate bids without considering national laws and regulations regarding tariff costs and seek to eliminate buy-national laws and tariffs relating to defense procurements; (2) the DOD method of meeting MOU obligations by waiving the Buy American Act has permitted European firms to compete with U. S. firms for costly defense contracts; (3) although DOD estimated that it had opened at least 44 percent of its procurement market to foreign competition in fiscal year 1990, European governments stated that the...
