Excerpt from The Latter-Day Saints Millennial Star, Vol. 84: October 19, 1922 Out on the hill sides and amid the pleasant vales of Utah, during the early Spring of 1849, one might have seen hundreds and thousands of people digging bulbs of the native sago lily and devouring them with a voracious appetite that the pangs of hunger had sharpened keener than a two-edged sword. The crisis had passed. The Mormons were given a six-year period of respite. Nature and nature s God smiled a providential bene diction upon the efforts of their hard-earned toil. But the respite was only temporary. It was simply a lull before the military storm that was destined to break in presidential fury on the Mormon people. As the saints were assembled in peaceful and joyful concourse at the head of Big Cottonwood canyon, celebrating the tenth anniversary of their entrance into Salt Lake valley, three horse men, covered with dust and grime, urged their tired steeds into the midst of the gathering, and one of the horsemen, Orrin Porter Rockwell, thrust into the hands of...
