Not illustrated. 1855 Excerpt: .own imaginations have peopled the lakes and mountains of this wild country; and yet, from the fact of this unexpected vision to-night, connected with her previous story, I know no reason why I should refrain from telling you THE LEGEND OF THE WHITE LADY OF THE CLIFF. It is now fast verging on sixty years since an old gentleman, who was at once very wealthy and very singular in his habits, occupied a roomy, castellated house, distant some fifteen or twenty miles from the abbey we have just left. His wife had been dead for many years, and the only being about whom he cared was a daughter, just escaping from her teens, and adorned with all the beauty that belongs to the sex. For her to express a wish, was to have it gratified; for the old man doatcd on her immoderately, and never thought he could do half enough to please her. Night and day his anxiety was always the same--every moment thinking of her, and never happy except he was making her some fresh present, or giving her some new token of his regard. Dresses of the most expensive kind, jewels the most rare and costly, were continually heaped upon her, and his brains were always on the rack to find out some new thing with which to gratify her. No doubt there was a slight touch of insanity in this behaviour, but as it was of a praiseworthy kind, and not detrimental...
