Not illustrated. 1829 Excerpt: .to find that his appearance and grave looks excited no particular notice in the merry company present, who seemed merely to regard him as a country-man, whom they must treat civilly on his brother s account; and even his brother expressed more surprise than pleasure at seeing him; asked him to sit by him, and inform him if any thing was wrong, or what on earth could have happened, to bring him to Donchester at the present unusual time and season; hoped the family at Oldwood were all well as usual, and that his little nephew, who was named after him, had begun to say his letters, and to fill up his first pair of gray breeches. Mr. Creevy replied with a serious gravity, which drew the attention of the company to him, that he praised God they were all in their usual health, and in a thriving way; and that, from the particular favour of Providence, displayed in his own behalf, he was enabled day by day to turn yellow clay into still yellower gold, which however was nothing but dirt and dross to the precious-- But here his courage failed him, as he saw the eyes of the company turned to him; and he stopped short, and looked confused, like an actor who is imperfect in his part. Go on, Thomas, man, that I may understand thee, said his brother, aloud: I think thou ha st got a cast--go on, and tell us thy...
