Excerpt: . . . at 430, and at 5. 30 took the steamer for Ballachulish on Loch Leven, where we would take stage for Glencoe. The morning was cloudy--almost as bad as usual As we advance, the scenery becomes wilder and more picturesque, until we reach Ballachulish, famed for its slate quarries. Here we leave the steamer, which awaits our return, and take a coach to Glencoe, distant about 9 miles. Soon after leaving the town the rain came down in torrents, and as our coach was all outside there was no shelter. However, we were in for it. For about 5 miles we skirt along the edge of the loch, then turning inland around the base of the hill of Glencoe, we are soon hidden amongst the hills. The cluster of mountains which here rear their rugged summits to the sky have not been inaptly termed the Alps of Glencoe, for here they have been heaped together in wild confusion, and down their barren sides a thousand mountain streams V are rushing, mingling their roar with the piercing cry of the eagle as he soars away to his eyrie in the Black Rock, in the steep face of which, near to the summit, is shown a cave said to have been the hiding-place of Ossian. Leaving the coach half way up the pass, we walk to the dividing ridge. This spot is called the Meeting of the Waters, where three streams, one from the top of the...
