The high reputation of Mr. Cavallo as a Philosopher, the present great scarcity of his Elements of Natural or Experimental Philosophy, and the numerous inquiries made for this work, are the motives from which this edition of it has been undertaken. As to the plan, upon which it has been conducted, it is necessary to mention, that though the original text will be found considerably abridged, nothing material has been omitted; the reductions for the most part consisting only in the suppression of such phrases, or parts of phrases, as did not appear indispensably necessary for a thorough understanding of the subject. These reductions have put it in the power of the editor to find room for a number of useful additions, which he has borrowed from various esteemed authors. Whatever may be safely omitted in a first perusal of this work, is printed in small type; and those subjects which require more than a general knowledge of the mathematics, are treated in separate notes placed after the respective parts, to which they belong. The clear and evident manner, in which the doctrine of motion is treated in Part I. of these elements, has induced the editor totally to suppress the 14th chapter of that Part, containing the description of a few machines, by which the experiments concerning the various laws of motion are generally performed in a philosophical apparatus, as not indispensably necessary. Whoever wishes to see a complete account...
