Excerpt from The Principles and Plan of the National Bank of England Explained: To Which Is Added the Prospectus of the Undertaking Sums as the current demands of their business may require them to possess; the capitalist not unfrequently lodges larger amounts in their hands, to be available for any investment he may determine upon and the landed proprietor deposits with them the ready cash which he may not want for immediate expenditure or use. The floating capital, again, thus placed at their disposal, is capable of being re-advanced to the public on proper securities, assuring facility to the commerce, accommodation to the trade, and support to the industry of the country. Nor is this all: the Country Banks, to which we are specially advertising, are not only the reservoirs of our capital, but the fountains of our currency; their promissory notes being adopted to a great extent, as a more convenient substitute for the costly and clumsy circulation of metals.
