Excerpt from Fundamentals of Oral English: A Course for Secondary Schools There is a growing demand among our secondary schools for systematic instruction in Oral English to supplement the work in literature and in composition. Appreciation of literary masterpieces and effectiveness in written communication are two great aims of all instruction in the mother tongue. However, the vernacular is primarily a spoken language and happily a realization is awakening that preparation for effective living demands the ability to speak well ones own native tongue; that this ability rests upon habits of body, of voice, and of mind which can be directed and cultivated; and that bad habits of speaking, if they are taken early enough, can be eradicated. In response to this increasing conviction, many secondary schools are attempting, in more or less random ways, to find some method of instruction in oral work; but there are as yet comparatively few attempts systematically to organize courses in Oral English which shall correlate with the general courses in English. Purposes of this Bulletin The purposes of this bulletin are: (1.) To develop proper habits...
