Keith Publications LLC, 2017. Paperback. Condition: New. Language: English . Brand New Book  Print on Demand . Sandy stood in front of the brownstone cottage he shared with his mother. He awaited the last load of bloody bandages to take to the waste disposal site where they burned them. Johonna Sandresson walked to the door and dumped her handful of medical waste in the rusty wheelbarrow. Don t dawdle, she warned him. You have classes this morning. I ll hurry, he said, waved, and left the cottage pushing the full wheelbarrow on the gray cobblestones. He passed the only two brownstone cottages near his mother on the left with a small park on the right. Sandy turned left on the first street. Most of the gray stone shops had not opened yet, though the bakery at the far end had customers lined up for the new loaves. The aroma of freshly baked bread wafted from the store. Sandy came out at the edge of the town square. Awnings of yellow, red, and green, a rainbow of colors, flapped in the early morning breeze. He skirted the square as vendors hawked their goods, trying to entice the shopper over to their stall so they could sell them their wares. Frying sausages joined the aromas that tried to mask the stench of too many unwashed bodies in one place along with piles of horse apples. As Sandy got ready to make the turn right to the fire site, he noticed a dozen black robed masters hurrying to the academy he attended for magical training. They spoke among themselves, but Sandy was too far away to hear anything. Sandy shrugged as he strode to the site and dumped the waste down the dark metal chute. Without the load, he returned home much...
