Excerpt from Rfd Letter to Radio Farm Directors From Radio and Television Service: June 1958 In the meantime, you are probably mulling over some of the revelations made at the 51st annual meeting of the American Society of Agricultural Engineers held at the university of California, the first half of this week. Maybe you noticed the report of the committee headed by our farm.structures researcher, Wallace Ashby. That committee summarized replies from ag. Engineers all over the country on farm building trends. They indicated that since it is impractical to replace all obsolete buildings in the near future, special attention is needed to adapting existing buildings for the transition from.diversified operations to larger, more specialized farming. Many livestock buildings do not meet new needs which lean toward more confinement and drylot feeding. Changes in feed-crop hand ling methods were also indicated as a well-marked trend that affects building design. Many replies stressed the need fer better communication between research workers in government and industry, and farmers, builders, and dealers maybe that s where TV comes one of our research engineers, V. S. Aronovici suggested taking a tip from.the Dutch, by reclaiming submerged lands near big cities to help overcome shortages of cropland. He pointed out hundreds of thousands of acres of submerged lands bordering the coastline from New Jersey to Texas, and tidal flats and shallows such as those around San Fran cisco and Illinois Exp. Sta. Scientists described completely automatic housing and feeding facilities for hog raising. The facilities developed at Urbana automatically supply feed in given quantities at specified times. Housing and feeding accomodations are restricted to force hogs neither eating or resting into an exercise area, which is cleaned automatically...
