The great gateway stood wide open, and through it one could see the fine stone house with its vine-covered balconies, its rare flowers and stately trees. A light breeze swayed the roses, sending out their perfume in little gusts of sweetness, while across the path the merry sunbeams flickered, like little dancing elves. Down the path came a lovely little girl, swinging a skipping-rope, and dancing over and under it in perfect time with the song which she was singing. The sunlight touched her bright curls, making her look like a fairy, and now she skipped backward, and forward, around the circular garden, and back again, only pausing to rest when another little girl ran across the lawn to meet her. She was Dorothy Dainty, the lovely little daughter of the house, and the sprightly, dark-eyed child who now joined her was Nancy Ferris, her dearest playmate. I was just wishing you'd come out, for I've something to tell you, Dorothy said. You know Aunt Charlotte has all her plans ready for opening her private school next week, and you heard her tell mamma that the class was very full. Oh, I know it's to be a big class, said Nancy, for besides all the girls that used to be in it, there's to be one new one, and one boy, Katie Deans' cousin, Reginald, and, oh, did you know that Arabella is to join the class? Why, Nancy, are you sure? asked Dorothy; only yesterday we looked over toward her house, and there seemed to be no one at home. Nancy's eyes were merry. This item ships from La Vergne, TN.
