Especially in those schools where pupils are prepared for business, than for primary schools or Classes. So says the helpful preface; but a child of average ability might fairly master Colburn's and the first four departments of The New Arithmetic in the first four years of a grammar school course. Then if he should have, in the fifth year, an elementary course in literal arithmetic and simple equations, giving his last year to completing The New Arithmetic, he would be better equipped in knowledge and mental power, for either business or the high school, than the majority of pupils are when they leave the grammar school.
