Federalism describes a national form of organization consisting of at least two members, who are joined together by means of a voluntary agreement or treaty into a unitary state having its own national characteristics,¹ but without discarding the distinctive national attributes. Through this coalition the individual / federal states surrender their jurisdiction and individual powers to the unitary state. In return, the federal system makes sure that the unitary state and the individual states control and assist each other mutually when fulfilling their obligations.² Federalism is especially characterized in that assignments, revenues and expenses are distributed on several national levels.³ Furthermore, federalism must safeguard a certain unit from a (foreign) political, economic, military and socially cultural point of view.⁴ Basically, federalism implements an equilibrium between decentralization and centralization.⁵ Aided by expenses and the division of assignments, revenues and expenditure, an optimal allocation is put from theory into practice.⁶ In Germany, the 16 federal states (Länder) make up the federal state, the German Federal Republic. Powers to and responsibility for national assignments in the government and governmental management, legislation and the administration of justice is divided between the federal state and the individual states. The German constitution ensures that in addition to this vertical division between the federal and the individual states' authorities, a horizontal division of powers exists be 24 pp. Englisch.
