Where, then, did Defoe find the printed materials for his history of the Plague? In the first place, the statistics of the deaths from the distemper, which are manipulated with much skill by Defoe to awe the reader with the increase, spread, and appalling magnitude of the disease, were taken directly from the Bills of Mortality, first compiled in 1665 as London s Remembrancer, by John Bell, one of the Parish Clerks. The same year, John Graunt included these Bills in his Reflections on the Weekly Bills. This latter book was reprinted in 1720, and probably furnished Defoe with his figures, as the Journal shows indications that its author had read the Reflections. It is more than probable, also, that the files of the 1665 newsbooks / were examined, as I shall show, as these contained the Bills as they appeared each week. As to this important feature of the Journal I need only add that, / with the exception of two or three slips in copying or in proofreading, Defoe is absolutely faithful to the original Bills. It should be noted that these plainly indicated the progress of the Plague from parish to parish. With a London map before him, together with his accurate acquaintance of the town, Defoe should have had little trouble in evolving his history. But as he did not give himself the time to arrange and organize his materials, the Journal is far from...
