Pulmonary Diseases. The lungs have not as yet been considered by us as a simple tissue, because they are an organ; nevertheless, in pathology, we must regard them as such, although, there does not exist in any part of the body any thing analogous to them. They differ especially from other organs in their diseases. Their inflammation, for example, has nothing in common with that of others: the progress of it is more rapid; the pus has a very peculiar nature and odour. Tubercles exclusively belong to this, organ, as well as calculous concretions. The diseases of the lungs are extremely common, which results without doubt from the close relations of this organ with exterior...
