Excerpt from The Age of Concentration: An Address Delivered at Convocation, Fall Term Simpson College, Indian, Iowa Wednesday, September 11, 1907 An old custom existed in Babylon of carrying the sick into the public square and there exposing them to the gaze of passers-by. The latter drew near, asked the symptoms, the means used to decrease the malady. If they have had or still have anyone amongst all their relations suffering from the same ailment, they describe the remedies that have cured them. Maspero s Egypt and Assyria. The American people, Whose ancestors and forerunners fondly believed that their institutions were immune to the diseases which had killed off their predecessors upon the human scene, are now following this grim custom of half a hundred centuries agof They may be seen carrying their afflicted into the market-places of nations and of history in the fond hope of obtaining a diagnosis of ills and sug gestions of remedy. We no longer live in Utopia or Arcadia, while the Ship, Human Perfection, once thought to be mirrored on the mirages of the Future, has not, even yet, found anchorage in our harbors. Questions are raised, doubts are hinted, maladies have developed, while remedies, more numerous than those known to the Babylonians, are proposed. I shall venture to deal with the question, - old when the most ancient of civilizations was new - viz: the con centration into few hands, groups, or systems, of the power inherent in numbers. This is the more necessary because since the later years of the Fifteenth Century, the centri fugal forces of society have left largely to individuals, churches, parties, governments, large or small, and local bodies, whether official or...
