Forgotten Books. Paperback. Condition: New. This item is printed on demand. 552 pages. Dimensions: 9.0in. x 6.0in. x 1.1in.Excerpt from CopyrightedIn the following pages the author has discussed some of the important relations of the engineer and architect in practical life, with which it seems essential that the technical man should become familiar before entering professional practice. Legal and contractual relations are but briefly discussed, as these subjects are fully treated in many valuable works to which it is intended that these notes shall serve simply as an introduction. The principles of personal and ethical relations, while outlined quite fully and discussed in somewhat greater detail, are but inadequately treated on account of the lack of space. The preparation of specifications is discussed in greater detail as less published matter is available on this subject. The analytical system suggested for the preparation of specifications has been used by the author for nearly thirty years, and is believed to afford a safe and logical method for the preparation of these papers. In the teaching or study of any subject, success comes through the ability of the teacher or student to so simplify the subject that its basic principles may be easily comprehended: the greatest difficulties follow an attempt to attack the subject in a too complicated manner. In the teaching or study of the preparation of specifications. little advance can be made by an attempt to prepare an elaborate specification for a complicated engineering structure of which the student knows nothing. In such a case, all that can be expected is the copying, with perhaps some small changes of some similar specification prepared for some proposed or completed work, and such practice will be of little value. The principles and elements of specification writing should be taught by the preparation of...
