Excerpt: . . . 11 In our annual report to Congress this year, Patterns of Global Terrorism, 1999, we describe the shift in some detail. This was one of the two trends we identified as the most important recent developments in terrorism, the other being the shift from well organized and hierarchical groups supported by state sponsors of terrorism to the loosely organized international networks of terrorism that are often able to raise funds and sustain themselves by smuggling narcotics trafficking, kidnapping, extortion and other types of fund raising. Mr. Chairman, I just returned from the Philippines and before that Colombia, where this new type of terrorism is manifesting itself in a very dangerous way. It was very troubling for American interests in both of those countries of longstanding importance to the United States. I purposely addressed the trends that I alluded to earlier on the very first page of...
