Unfortunately, the direct computation of skyline load - carrying capability is not a simple procedure. The mathematical model of the skyline cable arrangement consists of a set of hyperbolic functions. As these hyperbolic functions are transcendental (that is, they cannot be manipulated algebraically for direct solution), it is difficult to obtain numerical solutions. An iterative (trial and error) procedure is required to determine numerical results. In terms of man - hours or computer time, these trial-and-error procedures can become very costly. This paper presents an iterative procedure, developed to provide numerical solutions to skyline problems, which has proven to be more efficient than other methods in the use of computer time.
