'Yes, We Can' was a synonym for the 'American Dream'. It was first said by a candidate of the Democratic Party, who wanted to become the first African American president. But Obama was not the first politician, who wanted to follow the citizen's wish for improvement of an old system and more humanity. Forty six years before, another man told all Americans, that 'We Can Do Better'. The meaning and choice of words is quite similar. Both talked about solidarity, a wind of change and equality of all people, because 'We' means everybody without exceptions. But is it only the slogan, which shows similarities of both or do they have more in common than this And why is research and knowledge about it necessary In my opinion we should have a constant awareness and knowledge about...
