THE ENDLESS BATTLE

As the late Maya Angelou said, a bird doesn't sing because it has an answer, it sings because it has a song. The Endless Battle is yet another song from Andrew Nyongesa's copious literary harp. Through careful management of language able to yield pleasure owing to the splendour of the linguistic manipulation, the novel brings out an unsparing instinct for reality to bear on the platitudes and pieties of society. The concreteness of texture of the language employed evokes and recreates sensory perceptions that, without being preachy, bring out the projected meaning. The sense of human tragedy fortifies the main character, Eugene, against despondency, self-deception and easy consolation. As Robert Frost would say, the author of The Endless Battle has truly been acquainted with the night. When power in whatever form leads people towards arrogance, Literature reminds them of their limitations. When power narrows the areas of people's concern, Literature reminds them of the richness and diversity of their existence and the need to promote healthy vibrant societies, to ameliorate human suffering, to promote a more thoughtful, substantive, empathic world order. When power corrupts, literary art cleanses; for Literature establishes the basic human truth which must serve as the touchstone of our judgment. I congratulate Andrew...
