Excerpt from The London Encyclopaedia, or Universal Dictionary of Science, Art, Literature and Practical Mechanics, Vol. 19 of 22: Comprising a Popular View of the Present State Knowledge Constantine and Licinius. - While this great change was proceeding, Maximin, governed in the east, marched against Licinius with a very numerous army but a general engagement ensued, in which Maximin suffered a total defeat. Maximin, however, having escaped the carnage, once more put himself at the head of another army, resolving to try the fortune of the field; but death anticipated his designs. Constantine and Licinius being now undisputed possessors and partners in the empire, all things promised a peaceable continuance of their friendship and power. Pagan writers ascribe the rupture that unexpectedly took place between these two potentates to Constantine; while the Christians, on the other hand, impute it to Licinius. Both sides exerted all their power, as usual, to prevail, and, at the head of very formidable armies, came to an engagement near Cybalis, in Pannonia. Previous to the battle Constantine, in the midst of the Christian bishops, begged the assistance of Heaven; while Licinius, with equal zeal, called upon the pagan priests to intercede with the gods. Constantine, after an obstinate resistance from the enemy, became victorious; took their camp and, after some time, compelled Licinius to sue for a short truce. It was indeed short: but we have pursued the rest of the history of the first of the Christian emperors in the article referred to. He conceived and executed the bold measure of transferring the seat of the empire from Rome to Constantinople. The empire had long before been in the...
