Excerpt from Systems and Equipment for Packaging and Price Marking Meat and Poultry in Retail Food Stores Generally, the disadvantages of the wrapping machines compared to a hand wrapping operation are (1) the wrapping machines usually do a poorer wrapping job, (2) they are expensive, and (3) they have a higher maintenance cost. During peak sales periods the, production rate of a semiautomatic wrapping machine can be increased 50 to 60 percent by using two workers on the machine. This higher production rate is obtained at an increase of 23 per cent in labor costs per package. The quality of the wrap of a semiautomatic machine can be improved by (1) selecting the correct film size, (2) setting the temperature of the heating elements properly, and (3) keeping the surface of the heating elements clean. Five factors to consider in obtaining the most efficient use of the wrapping machine are as follows: (1) Place equipment to obtain a smooth, continuous flow of product; (2) subdivide large amounts of similar size and type of cuts for releasing to the wrapping machine in one batch; (3) use conveyors to feed pans of product directly from the cutting stations to the input end of the wrapping machine; (4) position hand wrapping stations so that all packages go to the wrapping machine first; and (5) position automatic scale and label printer close to the feeding end of the wrapping machine to minimize walking time.
