Excerpt from A Northern Plea for the Right of Secession One star, followed by another and another and others still, have fled from the American galaxy. Whether there is any legitimate or illegitimate power able to sieze and replace them again, and bind them in their former and formal courses of reluctant submission, is the question of the times. It is to the candid and deliberate consideration of this question, that I now ask attention. An exigency has occurred in the history of our country, which requires the guidance of fundamental principles and the promptings of a magnanimous spirit. Without original and profound views of the principles of government, we shall find ourselves bewildered at every point. Nay! we may fancy that we are incidentally advancing the cause of freedom, when, in fact, by obeying the dictates of prejudice and following the precedents of the past, we may be forging chains for ourselves, and strengthening those which have so long bound the Negro slave. It may be thought strange that, with my well-known hostility to American Slavery, together with the almost unanimous anti-secession feeling of the North, I should, in this specific controversy, take the side of the South. But it is not in the enslavement of her poor, that I side with her; but in her inalienable right of national sovereignty. The greater question of the existence of slavery is a distinct matter, and, if involved at all, very differently, in my apprehension, from that of the popular mind generally at the North. Nor have I failed to give duo consideration to that greatest of...
