Excerpt from A Sermon Preached in the Ruins of Hawarden Church, After Its Partial Destruction by Fire, on Sunday, November 8th, 1857. What simple and affecting scenes of domestic life, for instance, are set before us in the histories of the Patriarchal ages and others of a later period. What a mirror for great and public men in the lives of Moses and Samuel, of Daniel and David. How natural yet how picturesque is the chapter from which the text is taken; and how easily does the greater part of it accommodate itself to our condition here and. Present state of mind. We are not merely told that Nehemiah was moved by the desolation of his country to return thither and repair its ruins, which would have been enough to record the bare historical fact; but regard has been evidently had to the interest which any one similarly circumstanced might naturally feel in the matter; and we are allowed to observe how the first thought arose in his mind, to accompany him from the moment he determined upon attempting the work, and note all the trials and difficulties he had to encounter in its accomplishment. And this is a part of what I would call the human character of the Bible, that it thus draws us with the cords of a man, entering into our thoughts, satisfying our curiosity, and consulting our affections; not only narrating what was done, but discovering to us all the feelings and difficulties of those who did it, that we may not want for encouragement or instruction under like circumstances.
