All we claim for physiology is that it is an experimental, and from its very nature an imperfect science, but these results in vital statistics would make it not very remote from even a mathematical demonstration. The aim of physiology is to expose the phenomena of life, and this can alone be done by the most faithful study of the most wonderful work of nature. We deal with simple facts, naked truths, well established realities; and thus indeed has this modern science of life been created. We take pride in stating that the circulation of the blood, the absorbent system of vessels, the introduction of vaccination against small pox, the use of chloroform.
