Star Cloud Press, United States, 2008. Paperback. Book Condition: New. 229 x 152 mm. Language: English . Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Following The Oswego Fugues and Communion of Asiago, Stephen Murabito consummates his trilogy for a former time and place: the 1960s and the West Eighth Street neighborhood of Oswego, New York, where people still carry the strong scents and accents of old countries. These lovely narrative poems- inflected with the home ache that is nostalgia s English translation-lament the loss of the local everywhere. As testament and elegy, they demonstrate the wages of trading bad cheddar for good Gargonzola, but by writing, Murabito redeems even that defeat. Julia Spicher Kasdorf MFA Program Director, Penn State University Stephen Murabito s new collection, Lowering the Body, vividly brings to life a time, the 1960s, and place, upstate New York, that is lost to history, but beautifully rendered in these poems. As seen through the eyes of a child-observer whose Italian-American father runs one of those corner grocery stores that began disappearing by the end of that decade, the lives of an extended family, friends, and colorful neighbors are lovingly detailed. One hilarious and trenchant poem, My Mother Joins the Hippies, portrays a moment in the community when protest of the Viet Nam War and women s rights accidentally met in the rural north: Mrs. Berlin, Mrs. Ferraro, and Mrs. Grimaldi joined the hippies protesting that a pregnant teacher who is showing has lost her job, Mother among the women joining the march and Carrying the grocery stamper higher and higher like some kind of baton. In the heartbreaking Burying Cousin Peter, the grieving father of the soldier son who died in Viet Nam beats a man up onto his front porch/ leaving him to bleed/ Into the last...
