Excerpt from Introduction of New Regional Indexes for Food Consumption Analysis The regional cross-section indexes were developed to help appraise the effect on overall food consumption of variation in consumption of individual foods in households with different income, urbanization, and region characteristics. Current value of consumption of each food item, available in the basic reports of the 1955 survey, cannot do the job because local price and quality differences confuse comparisons among groups of households. In the new indexes each food item consumed is valued at the same price for all groups of households Differences by income group within a region and differences among urbanization categories and regions represent consumption differences, ignoring price and quality variations for a given commodity.
