And the old lady flew about with alacrity, beating up her last egg and stirring in the last measure of flour the bag held. So Bobby feasted, and the two chattered away while Lion thumped his tail earnestly against the floor. After Bobby had gone, Miss Polly gloated over her valentine, and read its message with grateful tears. Even if the wolf were at the door, did she not have the sweetest of treasures, the love of a dear child heart? But Bobby came back, flushed and panting. I did forget my mother's note, he cried, throwing it on the table. It asked if Miss Polly could come and sew for her for some weeks. She was in such a strait, needing everything for herself and Bobby....
