Excerpt from Practical Cookery: A Compilation of Principles of Cookery and Recipes and the Etiquette and Service of the Table. Of first importance in good cooking is efficient management of the application of heat. An understanding of the structure of the modern apparatus for this purpose is necessary to its skillful management. A Coal stove or range is an iron box arranged to confine fire and the heat from it, to make it more effective and economical for cooking. The fire box usually extends across one end of the range and is about twelve inches deep. The lining on the sides and ends, which is of fire brick or cast iron, is made to withstand the high temperature of direct contact with the fire. When hot water connections are desired, one side lining is replaced by a hollow iron box called a water front or a water back, depending on position (see illustration). The bottom is a grate, perforated for circulation of air and movable to allow the easy removal of waste. In general, this consists of two triangular bars, perforated on one...
