Excerpt: .eggs from one locality, would give us a few notes upon the recurrence of individual types in their eggs of Red-shouldered Hawks. J. M. V. No attempt has ever been made to describe in detail the wonderful variations to which eggs of the Red-shouldered Hawk (But: -0 lineatus) are subject. For many years the celebrated oologist J. M. V. (Mr. (7. L. Rawson) has devoted much time to collecting fine series of eggs of this bird, and in obtaining desirable specimens he had of necessity to discard many sets which were nest stained and marked in a commonplace manner. Every year, however, he was able to add several sets which were noticeable either for beauty of coloration, odd form, or some peculiarity. Keeping also a number of typical sets, in time, his collection of the eggs of this Hawk became the finest and the most complete in the world. Some years ago he went over it with the greatest care and selected all the handsomest, oddest, and most typical sets, and presented them to me in the most generous manner. Every year since he has sent me some more fine sets--the best of his taking until the series described below now contains fifty-eight sets of his collecting. I have remaining nineteen sets from other collectors were selected either to show geographical distribution or for their oddity or beauty. Taken as a whole the present series of eggs of this Hawk certainly is the largest,...
