Excerpt from The Australasian Medical Gazette, Vol. 11: The Accredited Organ of All the Principal Medical Societies in Australia and New Zealand; From October 1891, to December 1892 I was so imbued with the common-sense reasoning of the article that I at once set about obtaining picrate of sodium for my patients, and was fortunate enough to succeed in getting it made in Melbourne, where I am now actively using it, in conjunction with tuberculine, in doses beginning at f of a grain. One poor fellow, whose is not a suitable case for injections of tuberculine, has been taking picrine alone as a solatium, and has benefited thereby. His sputum has become less purulent, is more frothy and less bacterial, the bacilli showing decided signs of degeneration. Weight has been gained. And the appetite is immense. I have now had a total of 16 cases of phthisis under my care for the last eight months, and the least that can be said of those considered cured or well is, that they show no signs of relapse so far. That a great deal of...
