The greater number of the lesions of the motor cortex are at the same time destructive and irritative. They destroy the nerve-cells and their processes in a particular centre and by their presence and advance stimulate those of adjacent centres into morbid or disordered activity. The clinical manifestation of a destructive lesion of a motor centre is loss of function--paralysis; that of an irritative lesion abnormal muscular contraction. Important differences in the paralysis or abnormal contraction are dependent upon the position of the lesion as regards the motor segments. These differences are due first to anatomical relations and second to secondary degenerations. The cortical motor centres are more or less widely separated from one another, and a circumscribed destructive lesion of the motor area may therefore give rise to a limited paralysis involving a limb or a group of muscles in a limb--cerebral monoplegia....
