Excerpt: . . . to a charge of legal perjury, he added: Nor do I charge you that it is legal perjury. 2d. The words charged in the declaration are libellous, and the jury may give exemplary damages if they believe that the defendant intended, and did by their use, impute the crime of legal perjury to the plaintiff. 3d. In all such cases as these, if the jury believe the words charged were published by the defendant, and that the words are in themselves actionable, it is not necessary to prove special damages; the jury may give such damages as they believe, under all the circumstances of the case, would compensate for the injury done to the plaintiff, and inflict such punishment as the law allows to be inflicted upon the defendant. He further charged that, even if a newspaper quarrel was going on, and the plaintiff and defendant took part in it, and published libellous matter of each other, if one party sued the other, evidence of the publication of libellous matter published by the party suing, concerning the other party, ought not to reduce the damages, because one libel cannot be brought in as a set-off against the other. Unless the jury believe, from the evidence, that defendant published against plaintiff a libel, they must find for the defendant. If the publication complained of was made by defendant with the bonafide intent to protect his own interest in a matter where it was concerned, they must...
