Excerpt from The Arrowhead Magazine and Guide Book, 1919 Southern California needs no introduction. Environment and wealth have been the magnetic influences that have drawn people from far and near to this earthly Paradise. And the father of both of these, as far as Southern California is concerned, was the solving of irrigation problems. A delightful, healthful climate and rich, deep soil were the gifts bestowed upon this great district by nature, and it was left to the ingenuity of man to add water, the other essential feature, to this wonderful combination to make it perfect. So one district after another of this land of rare opportunity has been settled, until now there remain only a few spots of undeveloped rich lands, one of which, and probably the most promising of all, is the Palo Verde Valley, which borders the Colorado River, in Riverside County. Although this valley was comparatively little known three years ago, the writer presented the proposition to connect it by rail with the outside world to Mr. J. M. Neeland, who had been so successful in railroad...
