Diggy Duffy Publishing. Paperback. Condition: New. 662 pages. Dimensions: 8.0in. x 5.0in. x 1.7in. Moth is a sprawling contemporary Gothic horror set, for the most part, on the remote pilgrimage island of Skellig in, five miles off the wild western Atlantic coast of Ireland. Michael Eustace, the main protagonist of the novel, is a minor television celebrity and police consultant with a genuine gift for finding missing people. He is not a psychic and he doesn't see dead people, but he does experience the world in a very unique and unusual way. Michael Eustace can see human life and, through his pale blue eyes, human life has colour. But Michael's gift comes at a heavy price. He suffers from almost constant and often debilitating headaches which, he believes, are directly related to his colour-visions. The headaches make him appear both mysterious and aloof. And Michael's consultancy work, helping the police to find people kidnapped or just lost, has brought him into the darkest reaches of society and to the attention of some very dangerous and twisted people. Despite his day job as a television mystic he is a very private man who dislikes the limelight and has become something of a nomad, never settling down, never staying in the same place for very long. When Michael's search for Hanna, the daughter of a childhood sweetheart, leads him and his friend Detective Inspector Brian Horse Hopkins into the unexplored caves under the island of Skellig in, he discovers a world of unimaginable terror that has seemingly remained hidden since the dawn of time. Hopelessly lost in the darkness Michael must use his unusual gift to locate Hannah, find a way out of the nightmare and then defeat an enemy that threatens to destroy him and everyone he loves. Skellig in is an...
