The recent focus on Edward Snowden and revelations of US and British surveillance programs should not distract from one vital fact. The electronic networks on which western societies now depend are under constant malicious attack, trend growing. Whether military command and control or critical infrastructure grids (think power, water, transportation, financial, even agriculture and health care), state and non-state actors are consistently working to infiltrate, copy data, and/or position themselves for electronic sabotage in case conflict breaks out. A November 2011 study released by the US governments Office of the National Counterintelligence Executive publicly identifies China and Russia as the most aggressive collectors of economic and technological information from hacked US computer systems Foreign Economic Collection 2011. This year it became known that hackers presumed to be working for Chinese military intelligence accessed databases containing technical details of dozens of American high tech weapon systems, both operational and developmental. This immediately led to speculation whether the Chinese or other opponents could temporarily hijack control over these weapon systems in a future conflict. The information concerning the weapon systems hack was leaked from a January 2013 Defense Science Board report titled Resilient Military Systems and the Advanced Cyber Threat. This report, compiled by respected civilian scientists and policy experts, concludes that a full spectrum cyber campaign waged by a state actor with sophisticated capabilities is of such magnitude and sophistication that it cannot be defended against. The report therefore recommends that a successful (Department of Defense) cyber strategy must include a deterrence component. Some commentators have read this as a call for nuclear response to cyber attacks. While such a Strangelovesque recommendation is not actually contained in the report (at least...
