PART II De Mundi Sensibilis atque Intelligibilis Forma et Principiis Dissertation On The Form And Principles Of The SenSible And The Intelligible World Section I ON THE IDEA OF A WORCD IN GENERAL Paragraph i As the analysis of a substantial composite terminates only in a part which is not a whole, that is, in a simple part, so synthesis terminates only in a whole which is not a part, that is, the world. In this exposition of the underlying concept I have had regard not only to the marks pertaining to the distinct cognition of the object, but somewhat also to the two-fold genesis of the concept from the nature of the mind, which, being serviceable to a method of deeper metaphysical insight, by way of example appears to me not a little commendable. For it is one thing, the parts being given, to conceive the composition of...
