It is situated on the western side of the Lehigh River at the confluence of the Lehigh, Little Lehigh and Jordan Rivers, and some eighteen miles southwest from where the Lehigh flows into the Delaware, at Easton, Penna. It lies 90 miles west of New York City, and about 60 miles north of Philadelphia. It is known as the Queen City of the Lehigh Valley, being located in the heart of the general section of eastern Pennsylvania known by that name, and claims to be its commercial and industrial metropolis. A Brief Historical Survey. Judged by the standard of American municipal longevity, Allentown is an old city. It was laid out in 1762 at the direction of Chief Justice William Allen, who then owned all of the land now covered by the city. The name Northampton was given to the village, which, at the end of the first year, embraced 13 families. Its growth, like that of most colonial villages, was slow. At the outbreak of the Revolution, there were 54 families residing within its confines. The first federal census in 1790 revealed a population of 486. The United States Gazetteer, in 1795, describes Allentown in the following words: A handsome and flourishing town pleasantly situated on the point of land which is formed by the junction of Jordan Creek and the Little Lehigh. It is regularly laid out, and contains about ninety dwellings, a German Lutheran and Calvinist...
