Excerpt from 1814, July 25, 1899, Oct; 13; Lundys Lane: A Brief Account of a Third Military Re-Internment at Lundys Lane, Oct; 13th, 1899, With Notes and C Was the first speaker. He said, We have met to-day to pay a tribute of respect to the memory of those soldiers of the 89th and 103rd regiments, Whose remains are now re-interred and also in a sense to reaffirm our devotion to the cause for which they died. They fell fighting for the integrity of the British Empire, while engaged in repelling a most formidable invasion of this province. This was in fact, not the least important chapter of the mortal struggle with the first Napoleon. In the beginning of the year 1812, that great soldier was at the summit of his power. He had triumphed repeatedly over the mightiest collections of European powers. The frontiers of France had been extended by conquest to include Belgium, Switzerland, a large part of Italy and several German provinces. A French marshal had become King of Sweden. The Emperor had placed one of his brothers on the throne of Holland. Another wore the crown of Spain and for a third he had carved a kingdom out of the heart of Germany. He had made his brother-in-law King of Naples and his stepson Viceroy of Italy. The Emperor of Austria, the kings of Denmark, Prussia, Bavaria and Saxony had been reduced to the position of vassals, whose armies and revenues were at the command of the conqueror. The Sultan of Turkey was his firm ally. French garrisons were everywhere. Such a dream of empire had never been realized before;...
